

The Kamikaze 2000

Something that drives me crazy is when a Manufacturer comes out with a “New & Improved” model. It goes something like this: “The Kamikaze 2000, series II, is so much better than the original. Hardly anything from the original Kamikaze 2000 has been used in this far superior series II version. Here at the Earschplittenloudenboomer Audio Group we are very pleased with this new and improved version of the original Kamikaze 2000.”

This would imply that the original wasn't quite ready for prime time. If there were that much that needed to be improved why did it ever go to market in the first place? Would those who shelled out their hard earned cash be okay with a much better version coming out after trusting the original's advertising pitch? All of a sudden their Kamikaze 2000 isn't so good after all.

I'm not knocking advancements that lead to improvements. I'm knocking advancements and improvements in existing designs. Every model that we offer has been worked out to the finest and last detail. There are no bloody improvements necessary.

We will come out with new models that meet specific requirements (working on a couple of them right now), but they are different models. And they will meet every design requirement that we have come up with. If not, then that design would be scrapped. Ended. Finished. Terminated. Done. Sent to The Farm.

If it makes it into production then: NO IMPROVEMENTS REQUIRED.

Short, Sweet, Simple. That is all.....

HAPPY LISTENING
